Although the cream itself probably cools the coffee some initially, afterwards, the only difference between the two cups is the surface at the top of the liquid that is exposed to the air. Most lipids (like cream) will float to the surface, so the coffee becomes a “composite” material, with a layer of lipids at the top. Lipids are insulating, so the coffee with the cream will cool more slowly!